Fill your wedge chart

To gauge a distance for each of your swings for each wedge can be difficult without assistance. So why not book a session with us. Let's complete your wedge chart and at the same time, we can look over your three swings. Maybe there are other

Better ball striking

Struggling? Is it the release?

Last week we told you that one of the primary reasons that some golfers make poor contact is their weight movement on the downswing.

Instead of the weight moving from the back foot to front foot through the downswing, some golfers attempt to lift the ball at contact by making an ascending blow on the ball. This almost always involves the weight traveling the wrong direction – front foot to back foot - in the downswing.

The other cause of inconsistent and poor ball striking we see is the early release of the club; sometimes known as "casting".

In this image, the clubhead is being released very early, and the angle between clubhead and lead arm has been lost too soon in the swing. Clubhead speed will be lost at impact, and so will ball striking consistency.

Good ball striking requires that the clubhead is released to the ball later rather than earlier in the downswing. Look how the angle between lead arm and shaft has been retained.

Most amateur golfers finish short of their target, even after they've given it everything. If you're a mid to lower handicap, you need accuracy, and that's as much about distance. So think about taking one club more than you need and shortening the backswing and follow-through slightly.

What would improve your ball striking?

Is there a single fault that is impacting on the consistency and quality of your ball striking?
How easily can it be fixed? It's worth finding out because solid, consistent contact with your irons is one of the best feelings in golf. It's time for better.
