Fitting by the numbers

Where sweeter strikes lie

Recently we spoke about the importance of squaring the club face at impact to hit more accurate irons shots. Today we're focusing on something that can prevent you from squaring the face even if your swing is perfect and your shafts are correctly fitted for you: lie angle.

Making it easier to hit your target

Struggling with a pull? This may not mean you've made a bad swing but rather that your clubs' lie angles are too upright for you. Perhaps it's a push that plagues your game? A lie angle that's too flat could be the cause.

By fitting you for the correct lie angles, you'll find it a lot easier to control your clubhead through impact and keep the face square.

A positive change of just one degree alters shot direction by 4 metres!

Unlock your true potential

With the right iron lie angles you'll unlock your true approach play accuracy!

Ryan Fox surges past European Ryder Cup players to WIN PGA Championship!

Ludvig Åberg displayed his fallibility, Rory McIlroy charged and Tyrrell Hatton looked set to hand Luke Donald's European team a huge Ryder Cup boost. Instead, it was Ryan Fox who prevailed at the PGA Championship after a spectacular closing of 13 holes at Wentworth. Another victory for Srixon and Cleveland!

Track to improve

Green-light your improvement

Whatever happens on the green, if you've reached that green in regulation, you're improving your odds of scoring (and it feels fantastic to see your ball land and stick from over 100 metres out). We're going to help you experience that more often.

Track your tendencies and you'll know how to improve

Track your tendencies

How many greens do you hit each round? Is your tendency to miss them short, long, left or right?

Over the next three rounds, track how many greens you hit and when you miss, the nature and location of those misses. Anything less than four greens in regulation and you're placing too much stress on your short game.

Once we better understand your tendencies we can make swing adjustments that have the highest impact on your game.

Book a swing assessment

Book a swing assessment

If you're hitting less than four greens in regulation during 18 holes, we've got a massive opportunity to improve your score and your playing experience. And unless you're finding every green in regulation, there's always room for improvement!
